Abnormalities of the coronary microcirculation in hypertensive aortic stenosis: a postmortem study. Coronary atherosclerotic plaques are often present in hypertensive patients with aortic stenosis. The acute clinical consequences of a coronary artery plaque rupture as well as the chronic and potentially fatal consequences of coronary embolization are well established. A less clear picture emerges for the microscopic evidence of the underlying arteriolar damage in the form of dilation and tortuosity of postcapillary and/or capillary microvessels and/or the presence of fibrin-rich thrombi in the microcirculation. We sought in this postmortem study to evaluate morphologic abnormalities of the coronary microcirculation in hypertensive aortic stenosis using light microscopic histochemical and immunohistochemical methods. In all hearts, including those in sinus rhythm, the left ventricular endocardium did not show any grossly evident abnormalities. The coronary arteries were usually not stenotic. The coronary arterioles showed marked distal angioectasia in three out of 10 (30%) hearts and distal coronary microinfarcts in six of 10 (60%) hearts. The microvascular lesions varied in terms of numbers and sizes of angioectasias, microinfarcts, and thrombi and were located mainly in the noninfarcted area of the left ventricular wall. In the long run, the clinical implications and effects of coronary microvascular abnormalities in this early stage of hypertensive aortic stenosis remain to be elucidated. What is a Fundamental Misunderstanding? I was in a conversation with a friend last week about the nonsense that is being thrown around right now about the black community
